animals appeared over the ridge. I whistled and fired. I did not see the sights. I scarcely think I saw my rifle, but felt my aim as I would with harpoon or stone. I heard the thud of the bullet, saw the fatal crimson stain behind the front shoulder as the animal staggered, then sank down on the snow, dead. But I know it was mine. How delicious that tender, raw, warm meat was—a mouthful here and a mouthful there, cut from the animal as I skinned it! I ate till I darel eat no more, although still unsatisfied. Then Matt went back to bring up the dogs and sledges, while I commenced the work of removing the skins, and then down on the snow again. Matt came the sumptuous dinner of all. That was to last great lengths of the rich warm meat to the gaunt shadows which we called dogs, till they, too, could eat no more; and lay gorged and quiet upon the rocks.

"DELICIOUS MUSK-OX MEAT."

"The removal of the great shaggy pelts of the musk-ox was neither an easy nor a speedy job; and by the time it was completed, it was midnight, and the dogs were dead with fatigue, the sledging and whistling about our airy location. We were glad to drag the skins to a central place, construct a wind guard, with the assistance of the sledges, a few stones, and a couple of skins and make a bed of the others on the side of it. A little snow shelter was constructed for our cooking skins, and after supper our ravenous hunger, though still soft, and warm, we were for the first time able to spare the time to make ourselves some tea and cook some of the delicious morsels of meat. Then, with the sharp sombre northern land lying like a map before us, the barren rocks, mothered here and there with eternal snowdrifts, the summits of the distant mountains disappearing in a mist of driving snow, and the biting breath of the Great Ice following as ever here, and driving the snow over and about our shelter, we slept again as tired children sleep."
